"Enid Blyton has always been in this hallowed, sunny place in my head, and I am happy being in that space", says Roopa as she explains why and how this British author had a mighty influence on her not just as a kid but also as a writer.

On styling, Kadambari says, "Transforming Roopa into her favourite writer was all about getting the clothing right. A structured black blouse and vintage brooch were the main elements, and of course the pearls around her neck could not be missed. Adding colour to this black-and-white palette was the bold red nail paint to complete Roopa's look. In terms of the ambience, it was the distressed backdrop and chair with chintz-inspired print, and we were ready!
